

I would like FCC to reduce the number of broadcast licenses one company can own. The ownership of numerous licenses in various areas is leading to some owners blanketing the area with their political or philosophical views without allowing others to be heard.

If the ownership issue won't be changed, I'd encourage the FCC to develop a more thorough process for encouraging citizens to comment on the stewardship of the airwaves by some station owners. Besides requiring stations to ask for comments, the stations or FCC should also have to conduct a campaign to ask for comments through other media or competing broadcast stations. We'd like to hear some diversity of thought and entertainment out there, but stations aren't willing to let many groups have the ability to comment, or when they do, those groups are then ridiculed on air by broadcast personalities.
